girls, richly dressed. The eldest of the two particularly attracted him, for she was as beautiful as an angel; but as she came near to him, she, lifting up her hand, exclaimed: "What art thou doing here?" "The boy answered that he was trying to read. The child of affection denied him and said that she had heard of intellect in rags, and he was the personification of it. Her companion's answer was, that which the poor child must not forget, and the Lord is the Maker of them all. The elder girl drove the boy away from the steps, but the younger one took him into her dwelling and warmed and fed him there. When they parted, the little girl said, "You must not forget the 'Marian Hayes'." And Miss Hayes, he never has forgotten her. That ragged, dirty boy, is now before you, ladies, as Mr. Hamilton, the member of Congress; and allow me, Miss Gardiner, to tender my thanks to you for the kind treatment of that boy."

Overwhelmed with confusion, Louise knew not what to say or to do. In reply for her, Mr. Hamilton rose, and turning to Marion said: "I will see you again, Miss Hayes," and he left them. Louise would not stay in the city, where she met with Mr. Hamilton, and in a few days returned to New York, leaving her friends with the consciousness of having done nothing to be ashamed of, and enjoying the society of distinguished Congressmen.

From this, he said, "the man who is so distinguished for his intellect, learned to read. Do you recognize the book?" "Marian trembled and did not raise her eyes, when she saw the well remembered book. Mr. Hamilton took her hand and said: "Marian, I am never forgetting you. Since that day was so kind to him and gave him this book, his life has had one great aim, and that was to attain to greatness, and in after years to meet that ministering angel who was the savior of my days of poverty. When I left your house with this book, I returned to my humble home ten times happier, and went assiduously to work to learn to read. My mother was an invalid, and ere long I learned well enough to read to her. "When my mother died, I found good friends, and was adopted by a gentleman in W. As his son, I have been educated. A year ago he died, and left his property to me. Of all the pleasant memories of my boyhood, the one connected with you is the dearest. I have kept this primer next to my heart, and dwell upon the hope of again meeting the giver. I have met her. I saw her last night, and she was as kind as the dear hand that gave this book cannot be mine forever. Louise felt deeper grief than ever, when Mr. Hamilton said that he had met her. He said, "The poor boy whom she once spurned from her door, and derisively called 'intellect in rags,' had then learned a severe lesson, and one that soon changed the whole current of her life. For the first time, she had been brought to see that by persevering kindness, he made her feel easy in his presence, and she was soon the acknowledged friend of the Congressman and his noble wife. "Years have passed since then, and Louise is training up a family of little ones; but she is teaching them to despise not intellect in rags, but to be guided by Marian's text, 'The rich and the noble meet together, and the Lord is the Maker of them all.'"

INTELLECT IN RAGS.
It was a black windy day. Heavy snow drifts lay piled up in the streets of New York, and the bare appearance of the city was cold and dismal. Seated upon the steps of one of the large dwellings on Fifth Avenue, was a boy apparently thirteen years of age. He was literally clothed in rags, his hands were bare, and his shivering body was covered with cold. Lying upon his knee was a newspaper he had picked up in the streets, and he was trying to read the words upon it. He had been occupied thus for some time, when two men came along, and one of them, a gentleman in a fine coat, stopped and looked down at the boy. The boy looked up at him, and the gentleman said, "What art thou doing here?" "The boy answered that he was trying to read. The gentleman of affection denied him and said that she had heard of intellect in rags, and he was the personification of it. INTELLECT IN RAGS.
It was a black windy day. Heavy snow drifts lay piled up in the streets of New York, and the bare appearance of the city was cold and dismal. Seated upon the steps of one of the large dwellings on Fifth Avenue, was a boy apparently thirteen years of age. He was literally clothed in rags, his hands were bare, and his shivering body was covered with cold. Lying upon his knee was a newspaper he had picked up in the streets, and he was trying to read the words upon it. He had been occupied thus for some time, when two men came along, and one of them, a gentleman in a fine coat, stopped and looked down at the boy. The boy looked up at him, and the gentleman said, "What art thou doing here?" "The boy answered that he was trying to read. The gentleman of affection denied him and said that she had heard of intellect in rags, and he was the personification of it. Her companion's answer was, that which the poor child must not forget, and the Lord is the Maker of them all. The elder girl drove the boy away from the steps, but the younger one took him into her dwelling and warmed and fed him there. When they parted, the little girl said, "You must not forget the 'Marian Hayes'." And Miss Hayes, he never has forgotten her. That ragged, dirty boy, is now before you, ladies, as Mr. Hamilton, the member of Congress; and allow me, Miss Gardiner, to tender my thanks to you for the kind treatment of that boy."

Overwhelmed with confusion, Louise knew not what to say or to do. In reply for her, Mr. Hamilton rose, and turning to Marion said: "I will see you again, Miss Hayes," and he left them. Louise would not stay in the city, where she met with Mr. Hamilton, and in a few days returned to New York, leaving her friends with the consciousness of having done nothing to be ashamed of, and enjoying the society of distinguished Congressmen.

From this, he said, "the man who is so distinguished for his intellect, learned to read. Do you recognize the book?" "Marian trembled and did not raise her eyes, when she saw the well remembered book. Mr. Hamilton took her hand and said: "Marian, I am never forgetting you. Since that day was so kind to him and gave him this book, his life has had one great aim, and that was to attain to greatness, and in after years to meet that ministering angel who was the savior of my days of poverty. When I left your house with this book, I returned to my humble home ten times happier, and went assiduously to work to learn to read. My mother was an invalid, and ere long I learned well enough to read to her. "When my mother died, I found good friends, and was adopted by a gentleman in W. As his son, I have been educated. A year ago he died, and left his property to me. Of all the pleasant memories of my boyhood, the one connected with you is the dearest. I have kept this primer next to my heart, and dwell upon the hope of again meeting the giver. I have met her. I saw her last night, and she was as kind as the dear hand that gave this book cannot be mine forever. Louise felt deeper grief than ever, when Mr. Hamilton said that he had met her. He said, "The poor boy whom she once spurned from her door, and derisively called 'intellect in rags,' had then learned a severe lesson, and one that soon changed the whole current of her life. For the first time, she had been brought to see that by persevering kindness, he made her feel easy in his presence, and she was soon the acknowledged friend of the Congressman and his noble wife. "Years have passed since then, and Louise is training up a family of little ones; but she is teaching them to despise not intellect in rags, but to be guided by Marian's text, 'The rich and the noble meet together, and the Lord is the Maker of them all.'"

Overwhelmed with confusion, Louise knew not what to say or to do. In reply for her, Mr. Hamilton rose, and turning to Marion said: "I will see you again, Miss Hayes," and he left them. Louise would not stay in the city, where she met with Mr. Hamilton, and in a few days returned to New York, leaving her friends with the consciousness of having done nothing to be ashamed of, and enjoying the society of distinguished Congressmen.

The rebellion which has been excited in the Sentinels at Constantinople, by the endeavor of the New Prince Minister to introduce a reform in the lavish expenditures of the ladies of the Harem, is scarcely yet appeased; we have frequent accounts of the bitter complaints of outraged Sultanahs, and of the determined opposition of the foreign fourmiere of the Court have made a protest against the imputation of overcharging; they declare that the free which they are obliged to satisfy the capacity of the officers who order and pay for the silks and satins, lace and jewelry, furniture and carriages, &c., are so large that the sums added in the bills to the true value of the articles scarcely cover the outlay of the merchants. Notwithstanding the opposition and difficulties which surround the reform, it is steadily pursued; the system of reform, and is mercifully curtailing the luxuries of the Turkish Court, the details of which resemble the fabulous histories of the Arabian Nights, and astonish even the extravagant European.

We hear rumors of a conspiracy among the nobles and wealthiest of Parisian society to introduce a more moderate style, and less costly toilette for the approaching winter, and of a large number of the fashioning to introduce a which ornate, hooped and resorted were abandoned. But we certainly do not see any signs of the desired reaction; all areas is more lavishly decorated; the materials richer; and the skirts quite as full, more voluminous than during the last year. The only decided change introduced by Malam Pasha, and a noted by our other fashionable dress makers, is that of pointed corsets without basques. The lappets are entirely abandoned for all toilets except the most formal and fast costume. The body has two points in front and always one behind, sometimes also there is a point at the sides. The corage is trimmed with broad velvet, lace or fringe, or with rich Broadbourns. For the most part, the corage is made plain and high, without other ornament than a row of buttons, or a few bows, and is confined round the waist by a narrow waistband with buckle. The sleeves are closed at the wrists with a cuff of velvet, lace or fringe of ribbon. On robes destined for more dressy toilette we see a berthe or draperies; the sleeves are open, and are very wide and full. Lace is decidedly the favorite ornament for dresses, bonnets, mantles and cloaks. There is a new style of black lace which is daily becoming more in demand, and which is now extensively used by the most milliners and mantuagiers.

The manufacture of the dentelle de Cambria has been brought to such perfection that it rivals in beauty the finest Chantilly lace, it surpasses it in durability. There is the advantage also of obtaining a handsome and a valuable trimming at a very moderate price. Although not a silk lace, it does not come under the category of imitations, but is recognized by the artists and amateurs as a lace which may be worn in the most elegant toilette and by the most dainty lady.

Among the bonnets now displayed in the show rooms of Madame Alphonsine, those intended for the winter season are generally a mixture of royal and velvet, trimmed with velvet flowers, or with ribbons, and also various varieties of white royal velvets quilted with silk. A white tulle veil is ornamented with a cross piece of blue velvet, and a bouquet of white feathers gracefully placed across the front, and hanging on the side of the curtain. The inside trimming is composed of various shades of roses, and the strings are white, with a blue velvet stripe along the edge.

The magnificent establishment of Bourdin, displays at this moment a great variety of jeweled bracelets, destined for the most dainty ladies, and also a variety of necklaces, earrings and rings, all of which are made of the most precious stones set in gold mountings, wrought and plain gold. Bourdin may pride himself upon the precision of his clocks and chronometers. His models, in bracelets, earrings and rings, much admired; he employs much silver in these designs.

The novelties for the winter, which the perfume Parfumer gives, are of a wild rose, the gardenia and the anistole, the latter perfume, before being essayed. The articles of perfumery and cosmetics constitute a considerable item in the expenditure of a fine lady's pin-money, and have become within the few years past, one of the branches of exportation. The amount of flowers, which is imported in France from Italy and from the East, is enormous.

A series of lectures has lately been given in England on "Wombs that cry for Redress," which forcibly expose the evils and injustice from which the working classes suffer.

The details given in the Parliamentary evidence of the conditions of the working classes, and the dress-makers' apprentices are faithful. In ordinary times eighteen hours a day is the allotted time to work, and during the height of the season, when the young girls are to be allowed only four hours' rest, and the girls are to resume their toil. Strong coffee is administered to enable them to ply their needle for twenty hours without relaxation. In Paris, the suffering among this class is less, although much improvement is still to be desired in the matter of the rooms in which they labor are larger and better aired, the food is more substantial, and the hours of repose, even in the busiest season, are never less than six or six. The elasticity and gaiety of the French ladies, and the victims to endure more privation than the British. The exportation of the articles registered under the general head of moda—amounted for nine months of the present year—to nearly five million francs—nearly all from Paris.
